

From being adopted to becoming a parent:

when adopted people become parents and adopters become grandparents

Information for Grandparents

Who we are, what we're doing and why:

We (Beth, Julia, and Irina) are researchers at the University of East Anglia. We are looking in depth into the later lives of adoptive families: when adopted people go on to have children of their own and adopters become grandparents.

Because adoption has changed so much in recent decades, we are focussing on adoptions within the last 30 years.

Our aim is to find out about adopters' experiences as grandfathers and grandmothers and to find out about any support needs they might have. We are interested in questions like:

- How you feel about being a grandparent?
- How your adopted child has coped with being a parent?
- Whether becoming a grandparent brings up new issues for you or your family?

How we're doing the research:

We're going to be interviewing 40 adopters who are grandparents. (We will also be interviewing 40 adopted people who are parents).

Who we want to hear from:

If you answer YES to the following two questions, you are eligible to take part:

1. Did you adopt a child in, or after, 1989?
2. Does your adopted child have a child of their own?

We want to hear from a wide range of people and experiences, no matter how much or how little you are involved in your grandchild's life. We also want to hear from people for whom parenting and grandparenting has been quite straightforward and from those who adoptions and adopted children as parents have run into difficulties.

Please note we are not able to include step-parent adoptions.

What will be involved if I join the study?

We would like to visit and interview you face to face to hear your life story as an adoptive parent and grandparent. Because that's a big job, we will ask questions to provide a structure to help you to tell your story in a comfortable way. There are no right or wrong answers to any question. You can stop the interview or take a break at any time. The interview usually takes 2 hours.

Where/when will the interview take place?

The interview would take place at a time of the week/day convenient to you and the researcher, when you can be free of distractions and talk without other interruptions. People usually prefer us to interview them at home, or another place where they feel comfortable to talk freely.

Do you want to interview other people in my family?

We are also looking to interview adopted people who are parents, so your adopted children might want to hear about the study, and you could choose to tell them about it, or not. It is up to you. If you raised your adopted child with a spouse or partner, they too might be interested in talking to us. Some adoptive couples who are grandparents may like to be interviewed together, but because we are gathering individual life stories, we would interview each grandparent separately and confidentially – we won't tell each of you what the other has said.

We do not want to interview your child's birth parents, their partners, or your grandchildren for this research, but we are interested in hearing about them in your interview, if you choose to talk about them.

Will you tell other people what I say?

The interview is confidential and anonymous – this means that you will not be identified when we come to report the project. If you tell us something that makes us very concerned about your safety or that of another person, we are obliged to share information, but would discuss this with you first, wherever possible.

How will you remember what I say?

We would like to record the audio of interview so that we can concentrate on what you are saying rather than having to take lots of notes. This recording will be confidential and will be deleted after the research is finished.

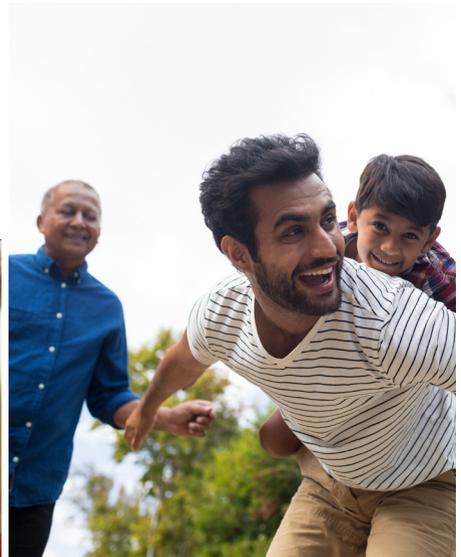

Why should I take part?

Taking part is a chance to share your experiences and to help build an understanding of the support adopted families might need in the future. There are no direct benefits from taking part in this research, but most people find telling their story interesting and enjoyable and you will receive £30 as a thank you, for your time and attention.

What do I do if I am interested in hearing more about taking part?

Please contact us (details overleaf) to learn more about the study and to decide if you wish to be interviewed.

Thank you for reading this.
